HOW A BOWERY TRAMP GOT INTO SOCIETY.

Nellie Bly Has a Talk with Mr. John Garvey, the Knight of the Road Who Slept in Mr. Astor's Bed.

A MYSTERY AS TO WHAT HE WAS DOING THERE.
John Jacob Astor Believes that There Was Some Scheme of Burglary on Hand and He Means to Find Out About It--Garvey's Pedigree.

N MILLIONAIRE ever gained such a unique addition to his vast possessions as did John Jacob Astor a few days ago. People have talked about the Astor millions, the Astor real estate, the Astor mansions, the Astor diamonds, the Astor receptions, and now they are talking about the Astor tramp.

Really, the whole thing is a very great mystery. I had some curiosity to see the Astor tramp, so I went to Jefferson Market Court and confided my wish to Justice Hogan. The Justice expressed himself very plainly on the subject.

People have talked about the Astor millions, the Astor real estate, the Astor mansions, the Astor diamonds, the Astor receptions, and now they are talking about the Astor tramp. The Astor tramp, so far as the Astors are concerned, is not a desirable possession. He is not a curio for which they sought, but having once possessed him they are anxious to put him where they know he'll be safe.

I waited in the Justice's private room until court was over and everybody gone. Then Justice Hogan's clerk brought the tramp in.

So far as the public can understand, the case is a peculiar one, and one of unsolved mystery. A man with the appearance of a tramp, and said to be unknown to the household domestics, was found asleep, or pretending to be, in a servant's room at 11 o'clock a week ago last Friday night. The door was locked, and had to be forced, but the tramp slept, or pretended, through the whole affair.

He seemed a little underdressed fellow, scarcely five feet five, and as he entered the room he looked at me furtively, as if wondering what was coming now. The clerk told him to sit down and he did so, taking the chair farthest from me.

Astor household being called to confirm or deny the charge. HE COULDN'T KNEEP AWAY. As the night of his arrest was not the first time the tramp had been caught in the Astor house, gaining entrance by means known only to himself, nor the sixth, seventh or eighth time he had been seen loitering around and watching the house, the Astors were nervous, just as poor people would have been, and they felt anxious to know the tramp's motives, or to put him where he could do no harm. So they wear out a warder to search the man, and the tramp is found in a Bowery lodging-house, is taken back to Jefferson Market.

I looked him over carefully. He did not resemble the tough-looking fellow as they called him, that I had been led to believe, nor was he like the highly sensitive pictures of him in the newspapers. He was, as I have said, an underdressed man, but being neither fat nor thin, rather like a man who always had enough to eat and who worked a certain number of hours a day.

smiled as if amused. He broghe for a little while after was decided, but before the interview was over it was forgotten and unnoticed.

"What were you born in Ireland?"
 "Yes."
 "Will you spell the name of the place?"
 "Dungelnon."

"How long have you been in America?"
 "Any relatives?"
 "None here."
 "None born in Ireland?"
 "Father."
 "Where's your mother?"
 "Any brothers and sisters?"
 "None know."
 "They may be all dead."
 "How many had you?"
 "None brother and three or four sisters."
 "Don't you know which; three or four?"
 "Yes; some or all may be dead."
 "What was your father and mother's names?"
 "Your brother's?"
 "Your sisters?"
 "Mary, Susan and Katherine."
 "You said you had four." I reminded him.
 "Did I? I was mistaken. I have only three."

 "Are you naturalized?"
 "Yes."
 "How long since?"
 "I've forgot."
 "Where did you get your papers?"
 "I've forgot."
 "Where are your papers?"
 "I don't know."

THE SECOND VISIT.
 "Then if you got nothing to eat, why did you go back a second time?"
 "Why, that's nothing," he exclaimed indignantly.
 "It looks like a great deal. You lived on the Bowery, you say, and you got up to take a walk. You ask at Astor's for something to eat, and are refused. Then you go back to the Bowery, and there are several hundred thousand houses in New York, you go back to the Bowery, and there you are once refused for what?"
 "I took a walk," he answered.
 "I don't see how you sleep the night previous."

WORKED IN A SHOOTING GALLERY.
 "How long since?"
 "I've forgotten."
 "Where else did you work?"
 "No, in Bowery."
 "At what?"
 "Shooting gallery."
 "Did you work on shares?"
 "No, in Bowery."
 "How long is it since you worked anywhere?"
 "I dunno."
 "Are you a Catholic?" I asked, and he looked at me for a few moments before he replied that he was. I asked where he had attended church, and he said he had forgotten, and the name of the church he had forgotten.

BERNHARDT'S LATEST ROLE.
 In Victorien Sardou's New Play "Gismonda," at the Renaissance.
 PARIS, Nov. 12.—According to Parisian critics, "Gismonda" is the grandest work of Victorien Sardou, already made illustrious by "Theodora," "Pedro," "La Tosca," "Paris," "Hernani" and "Mme. Sans Gêne."
 Although, in his opinion, "Gismonda" is as picturesque as "Theodora" and as dramatic as "La Tosca," its wonderful success is due more to the talent of Sarah Bernhardt than to the interest of the drama. The scene is laid in the Duchy of Athens, and dates back to the thirteenth century, but is a historical drama. The duchy is but the picturesque framework chosen by the author.
 Gismonda is a widow of Nesto II., last Duke of Athens. At thirty years of age she is made Regent during the minority of her son, Francisco. She is entirely occupied with the care of Francisco, and seems not to realize that the barons, her neighbors, are all anxious to see her fall from power. Her only ally is her husband, Almaric, who she will marry a man capable of defending her against the barons. She is a woman of high character, and her husband is a man of high character. She is a woman of high character, and her husband is a man of high character.

convent is surrounded, and the Begonia's life is in danger, when Almaric claims the populace, knocks at the convent door, enters, and makes himself prisoner of Gismonda. In a cell Almaric refuses to release Gismonda; she offers him for a price to let her go. He refuses. He refuses, but at last says: "If you only love me I give you your liberty." He releases her. She is a woman of high character, and her husband is a man of high character.

Listening, who learns that Gregoras, in addition to the latter Francisco to fall into the latter's hands. He follows the instructions of Zacharia, who, by supposition, had thought himself more sure to marry the mother. Now the complex proposition to kill Almaric, but on the other hand, his cabin is found. Gismonda, an act which she had struck and cleaves in twain Zacharia's Almaric's Almaric, and the agony of the dying man is intensified by her nurse, Thiseus, leaves Almaric, after the reflexions, who perceives two men stealthily approaching. They are Zacharia Franco, a hypocritical cousin, anxious for her hand, and Gregoras, the brother of the dying man.

Sarah Bernhardt in the third act wears a beautiful gown covered with embroidery. With wonderful art she and Guity render the successive emotions of the play. She shows her joy at the sight of a man who has been her enemy, and her despair, decided, to release Gismonda. The fourth act shows a ruined temple and Almaric's hut, while in the fifth act, the duchy is but the picturesque framework chosen by the author.

Almaric is the finest role ever played by M. Guity. His height and his voice are his great assets. He is a man of no less than that of Sarah Bernhardt. Without doubt Sarah Bernhardt's opening in this act has the triumph in her repertoire. The minor roles are all worthy of mention. The role of Gregoras, who is a man of high character, and the role of Thiseus, who is a man of high character, are also worthy of mention. The role of Zacharia, who is a man of high character, and the role of Francisco, who is a man of high character, are also worthy of mention.
